If certified therapy dogs can help children improve their reading fluency, the children will be more successful in life. My hypothesis is that certified therapy dogs will improve fluency in students reading. Testing was done using the same materials and alternating twice with the Delta Society certified dog and twice without the dog. The test was a reading comprehension quiz where the students read aloud. I found that therapy dogs did improve fluency by about 30 seconds each time the students read with the dog. The students did improve substantially because they were more comfortable and less anxious while reading with the therapy dog. My results show that therapy dogs should be used more often in schools.
